ABSTRACT

The study was done on the contribution of CIP towards the socio-economic well-being of the people of Bugesera district, Rwanda. It was guided by four specific research objectives. These were achieved using descriptive and case study approaches that applied questionnaire administration, interviews and direct observation to collect primary data and secondary data. The study found that CIP has made significant contribution to the well-being of the people of Bugesera district. The study thus recommends awareness rising was still important in the implementation of CIP. There was also need to increase the number of agronomists as there were reported inadequacies of the extension officers. Once the extension officers are increased, it was enhance access to such services by the farmers which is vital in increasing productivity and output
